For history of the football team, see History of Ohio State Buckeyes football. This article includes a list of references, but its sources remain uncl. Seventy-two percent of the funds were earmarked for the Ohio State University with the remainder split between Ohio University and Miami University.[5] By decade's end, the university's enrollment stood at 15,126 a more than fourfold increase from just twenty years prior. With the onset of the Great Depression, Ohio State would face many of the challenges affecting universities throughout America as budget support was slashed, and students without the means of paying tuition returned home to support families.
