Constituting identity: political identity formation and the constitution in post-independence Ireland

Full text not available from this repository.

Abstract

Book synopsis: This volume attempts to analyze the contradictory notions of citizenship posited by postcolonial Irish constitutional discourse. In the postcolonial period of Ireland's history, Irish citizenship has been marked by a conflict between foundational nationalist notions of the nation and a more liberal narrative of individual autonomy. This splintering into competing class, economic and other identity positions is at odds with the search for an Ireland, uncomplicated, cohesive and immutable. Patrick Hanafin does not set out to find a single definition as to what it means to be an Irish citizen, but rather to try and understand the different definitions already available. He analyzes "Irishness" within the context of culture and the law in Ireland and considers how representative the constitution, drawn up by individuals, is when reflecting Ireland as a whole.

Metadata

Item Type: Book
School: Birkbeck Schools and Departments > School of Law
Depositing User: Sarah Hall
Date Deposited: 04 Feb 2019 16:50
Last Modified: 04 Feb 2019 16:50
URI: http://eprints.bbk.ac.uk/id/eprint/26111

Statistics

Loading... 0 Downloads
Loading... 25 Hits

Additional statistics are available via IRStats2.

Archive Staff Only (login required)

Edit/View Item