Abstract
[Excerpt] Finding a job is hard work. Even though there are a lot of agencies out there that can provide help, it can still be a difficult process. The Institute for Community Inclusion (ICI) talked to adults with disabilities who used a state or local agency to find a job. ICI asked these individuals about their experience using an agency. ICI also asked them to explain other things that were helpful while they searched for a job. These nineteen job seekers told ICI that the following strategies helped them to find jobs that they liked.

Job seekers should always keep in mind that their primary goal is to sell their skills and experience. Now is not the time to be modest or downplay prior success. Find a way to sell yourself as a potential asset to desirable employers based on information they share with you. Heidi Duss. 12. Host a Job-Search Party. Instead of going to a networking event hoping to find the right people, why not host your own job searching party! Invite people who are in the career space you’re most interested in pursuing to come to a cocktail or dinner party. These people you invite will benefit by expanding t Job-seekers who are not sufficiently aware of how an ATS screens a resume may find it difficult to overcome that obstacle. Later in this piece, we’ll offer some ATS-related advice that can help you with this challenge. A Reliance on Outdated Resumes. For many struggling job-seekers, the problem is as simple as their resumes. When it comes to finding a job in 2019, successful candidates will have resumes that effectively showcase their value as employees. Unfortunately, many of today’s job-seekers have no idea how to craft that type of resume! For example, does your resume still rely on the objective statement to capture a hiring manager's attention? If so, that could be a major mistake.
