In 1846 a New Zealand Constitution Act (UK) proposed a form of representative government for New Zealand’s 13,000 colonists. The new governor, George Grey, argued that the settler population could not be trusted to pass laws that would protect the interests of the Māori majority and persuaded his political superiors to postpone its introduction for five years. One of the most significant in New Zealand history, it took place against the backdrop of the country’s first big nationwide strikes after workers at ports around the country walked off the job, initially in support of Australian unionists. The maritime strike caused enormous disruption to the colony’s trade and transport networks.
