Since late 1969, Led Zeppelin had been planning on filming one of their live performances for a projected movie documentary of the band. The group's manager, Peter Grant, believed that they would be better served by the big screen than by television, because he regarded the sound quality of the latter as unsatisfactory. Massot served a writ, leading to a period of stalemate which was finally broken when Grant and Led Zeppelin's lawyer Steve Weiss agreed to pay Massot the money he was owed, after which he delivered the film to the band. Massot was not invited to attend the premiere of the film at New York but he attended anyway, buying a ticket from a scalper outside the theatre. “Whole Lotta Love” is Led Zeppelin's most sexually explicit song — “love” can be replaced by both “sex” and “penis” in different sections. The track was largely inspired by Willie Dixon's blues track “You Need Love,” recorded by Muddy Waters. A 1972 lawsuit saw Dixon sue the band for copyright infringement, and Dixon was later credited. A cover of the song by Collective Consciousness Society was used as the theme song of BBC TV's Top of the Pops, a music program that aired from 1964 to 2006. I had [the riff in the middle of the song] worked out already before entering the studio. I had rehearsed it. And then all of that other stuff, sonic wave sound and all that, I built it up in the studio, and put effects on it and things, treatments. [I did the descending riff] with a metal slide and backwards echo. The 5 Love Languages® has been improving relationships for more than 25 years.
