The fourth essay, Modernity, suggests that Guys "has an aim loftier than that of a mere flaneur, an aim more general, something other than the fugitive pleasure of circumstance." It is here that Baudelaire connects Guys to the process by which one may poke into the margins of the here and now to distil the very essence of the eternal nature of Beauty. This higher order quality Baudelaire terms "modernity." Though Fashion is based on its being intrinsically ephemeral, he believes that this very ephemerality possesses subtle links to the eternal realm of Art and Beauty. Baudelaire Table of Contents.
