You can look at the heavy dependence of the European auto industry on China, and at other relationships like those of Siemens or Bosch, and you can’t think that Europe will be as bold as the Americans can be. I’m not saying the US isn’t also vulnerable, but the US also has a different kind of leverage over China, which is that China needs access to US markets even more than the US needs access to Chinese markets. So the trade imbalance that drives President Trump up the wall is in fact something he uses regularly as leverage. Thirdly, Europe needs to take the process of rethinking the transatlantic relationship very seriously. Yes, this means more security provision from European countries.
