Challenges faced by Nigeria today, and some ideas about how we got here, and what we can do to move forward.

Crime and Problems of Public Safety in Nigeria.

The Nigerian crime problem gives many citizens in this country sleepless nights. In many places, people feel they can no longer walk around their own neighborhoods unharmed. Public safety is the most fundamental responsibility of any state, and Nigeria has failed in this regard. The solution to Nigeria's problem is that the government should collect all the houses, estates, cars, taxes, motorcycle, Okada and company so that we all get an apartment from government and pay from our salary then Okadas and taxes will pay by tickets buying so no body will still money to build houses and estates because if they do, they do it for.
Other problems of housing delivery in Nigeria are connected with the imperfections in policy instruments and its implications. The problems can equally be traced to administrative bottlenecks in housing delivery. 3. Housing as a Policy. Another challenge that is facing the national housing policy is its inability to address the quantitative and qualitative housing problems. A major factor that is responsible for housing shortage in terms of quality and quantity is the ever-increasing demand that cannot be met by supply (see Agbola, 1998; Fadiye, 2005; Balchin, 1995; Sulyman, 2000; Jinadu, 2004; Jonna and Dean, 2012; Emma and Vida, 2013). This article attempts to examine the problem and challenges of public housing delivery in Nigeria. It highlights the nature and dimension of Nigeria's housing problems. Housing is one of the three basic needs of mankind and it is the most important for the physical survival of man after the provision of food. The discussion and debates on the Nigeria housing situation have always been anchored on the need for continuous state intervention through public housing delivery in solving the crisis. Public housing delivery in Nigeria is not only a social and environmental necessity but also a political and economic approach necessary to support social peace and stable development in the nations of the world.
