There's something magical about good nonfiction: it can plunge you into someone else's life and experiences, or transport you to a time or place you've never been before. This summer's crop of nonfiction new releases are especially promising, and will make the perfect companion whether you're headed to the beach or you're just camped out in front of the air conditioner. Inside its pages, readers will find images from Cole's travels around the world paired with musings and notes. In a starred review, Publishers Weekly wrote, “This ambitious study deserves a spot on the shelf next to Roland Barthes' Camera Lucida and Susan Sontag's On Photography.” We bet this book isn't quite like anything else you'll pick up this summer. Written by Ella Peary. Mid-American Review is a longstanding international literary journal, started in 1981 at Bowling Green State University in Ohio. Recognizing the power of literature to slow us from our daily movement and still our minds, they hope their publication will prompt us to contemplate ourselves, our world, and our place in it. Mid-American Review publishes both new and established writers who author moving, wonder-inspiring work made with meticulous craft. They publish all styles of fiction, nonfiction, and poetry from traditional to experimental, and prefer work that employs language as an artistic medium, painting layers of meaning that broaden beyond the author's own mind.
