Parliament itself was organised by the administrative personnel of the lords. The chancellor normally acted as the king's spokesman. He was responsible for opening parliament with a speech declaring the reasons for holding the session and he read out the king's answers to common petitions. The more mundane organisation of the assembly was shouldered by royal clerks who were also responsible for compiling the official parliamentary record, the 'parliament roll'. The records of parliament survive only sporadically in the 13th century, but from early in Edward III's reign ^ Olney, R. (1982) 'The Parliamentary Agents. A History'.
