This post will discuss the history of Greek philosophy, from the Sophists to Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle. It will emphasize the problem of knowledge. In Part 1 of this series of discussions about the history of Greek philosophy, we learned that for Parmenides and the Eleatics, there is no world-process. Now, if there is no world-process, then this means that there is no process or any change that actually happens in reality. The implication of this argument in epistemology is that there is no mental process and, for this reason, knowledge is impossible to attain.
