The person of the practitioner

Abstract

I have struggled to find the ‘right’ topic for this edition’s CPD. In the process however, I have managed to put a few possibilities for the future editions at the back of my mind. In the end I have chosen to use material that I have lived with over the last ten years since returning from a year as a Humphrey Fellow in the USA. Elements of this edition concern my personal story and so I have to state from the outset that, although there are elements of objectivity, particularly in terms of the work of people that I quote, this is essentially subjective material. I trust that some of you who read this will find a few points of identification for yourselves. I hope that if anything I say offends you, you will recognise that I am talking about my own experience, and not even attempting to state ‘universal truths’ on behalf of others.

Any person has to be treated as a human being, irrespective of the fact that such person is a criminal. The accused persons are also granted certain rights, the most basic of which are found in the Indian Constitution. The basic assumption behind these rights is that the government has enormous resources available to it for the prosecution of individuals, and individuals, therefore, are entitled to some protection from misuse of those powers by the government. If the police officials fail to produce an arrested person before a magistrate within 24 hours of the arrest, the police officials shall be held guilty of wrongful detention. 6.
