My current research is focused on the history of camping and wilderness survival. Specifically, I am exploring how our ideas about the landscape are constructed, and what it means when we interact with the wild by engaging in activities like camping. My recent mixed-media prints combine my own documentation of the so-called ‘wilderness’, with appropriated images from historical exploration documents, survival books, and online images of wild landscapes. These are merged with constructions of campsites and temporary shelters, which stand in for both real and imagined human experience. It is not always evident whether the shelters I have depicted are occupied, or if they are relics, abandoned. These campsites, and their accompanying landscapes, have
I would think it would work for an axe as well. You would need to make a notch around the head for the handle to wrap around. Then get a sapling of whatever size and type you want to use and cut it vertically (with the grain) far enough down to leave four inches of overlap with the main handle after you wrap it around the head in the notch. Boil the pared down end of the sapling until it is flexible enough to wrap around your tool head. Wrap the overlapped handle parts with wet rawhide also looping the rawhide strip around the stone in front of and behind the handle. Let it dry in the sun.
