Financially speaking a degree is essential for success. I will say that there are the few people who have gone on to have financial success without the aide of a college education but it is not likely to happen. For many jobs a person will also need continued education even after a degree. Education to keep up on the changes in your chosen industry. Why waste time to get a diploma or degree, when you can spend your time working for someone else and in return, have someone else to work for you in future?

Report Post. Like Reply. College is not needed to be successful. There are plenty of jobs that have high pay and has a great work-life balance that do not require a degree. “Today in America, if you want a job, become an engineer, any engineer.” O’Leary says. “It’s not the easiest college degree to get, but it’s one with the most, and best, outcome for employment.” You have to think about education as an investment because it’s going to cost you money and it’s going to create debt for you” in many cases, O’Leary tells CNBC Make It. As for O’Leary himself? He studied psychology and environmental science in college, but went on to attend Ivey Business School at Western University to earn an MBA, and then went into the educational software business before going on to eventually become the chairman of ETF company O’Shares Investments. According to The Princeton Review, O’Leary is not far off. Education is the key to success, without a good education you will find it hard to achieve success in one’s life. A good education is important because you will be able to think for yourself and communicate intelligently to other people.
